I		READ THE PROVIDED CASE DESCRIPTION AND GIVE DETAILED ANSWERS TO THE QUESTIONS Values in human life and the development of society. Values are one component of sociocultural forms. As society develops, ideas are formed, highlighted, and ascribed special value. They are assimilated by the subject through experience and feelings of pleasure and displeasure, joy and indignation—that is, through emotions. Values form the basis for the evaluation criteria that govern people's attitudes toward objects that satisfy human needs. Throughout life, people develop a perception of some objects as valuable, while others are unvaluable or even "anti-valuable." … Values can be individual, group, or universal. Individual values determine a specific person's actions and can be transient in nature, varying depending on the individual's age. Group values (meaning a group in the broad sense – as a social community, a type of society) are more general in nature: they are defined as the ideas accepted in a given community about the desired type of socio-cultural form. Universal human values are characterized by their enduring nature and serve as guidelines for most people, regardless of gender, age, or historical era. The number of such values is limited. These include, for example, truth, beauty, and goodness. Perceived and ingrained values become social norms that support, reproduce, and regulate human activity. [I. G. Petrov]
Q	1	Question: What, according to the author, is the role of values in society? Indicate two positions.
Q	2	Question: Name two factors that, in the author's opinion, contribute to the formation of values.

Q	3	Question: What three sets of values does the author identify? Which of these sets do you think includes the principle of equality of citizens before the law?

Q	1	Question: What, according to the author, is the role of values in society? Indicate two positions.
A		Correct answer: According to the text, values, firstly, form criteria for evaluation that regulate people's attitudes toward objects and actions. Secondly, they become social norms that support and reproduce forms of activity in society.
Q	2	Question: Name two factors that, in the author's opinion, contribute to the formation of values.
A		Correct answer:

		The author points out that values are formed through emotional experience (pleasure/displeasure) and the development of society, where significant ideas are identified and reinforced.
A		Correct answer: The author distinguishes between individual, group, and universal values. The principle of equality of citizens before the law is a group value, as it reflects the normative system of a particular society, rather than individual or universal guidelines.
